ABSTRACT

This research paper investigates the causes, sources, types, and the natives' perspective of violence against men. The research was conducted in NaiAbaadiChaakra, Saddar, Rawalpindi, Pakistan. Qualitative anthropological research techniques were used to collect empirical data. Social setup, culture, religion, geographical conditions, economic setup, moral standards and literacy are the major determinants of gender discrimination in any society. In order to investigate the causes of violence against men, all these plausible factors are studied in this research study with the help of individual and collective analysis. As a result, the causes of violence and discrimination against men by the hands of women are identified and analyzed. The research has important practical implications for people, organizations, policy makers, and government. Educating masses and providing adequate resources and support to the victims is necessary to reduce the instances of the violence against men. It also presents important research implications suggesting longitudinal and comparative studies in this research area in the future.
