ABSTRACT

Labeled as the social animal, man longs for relationships. Despite the fact that the modern world, dressed in its advancements, has brought many comforts to man, the true solace can be attained only through the close associate. Relations have reservations but the one with no bounds and limitations is friendship. A true friend is one who brings a ray of hope in to your world when you are lost in the chaotic world. It is he who will have the real faith in you and showers the pure love as a mother and opens the world of happiness and success for you. He also plays the role of a father who always makes you feel special with his presence and sharpens your ingenuity by resisting your waffling behavior, never trying to point out your mischievous deeds by bestowing on you the unconditional support. He is the one with whom you share most of your fanciful thoughts and experience yowling feats. The warm bondage that bosomed reminds of the kinsperson who always embraces you in traumas and puts up your self-reliance. This poem is an attempt to pay tribute to one such great friend.
